Promoter Interview Questions

The job description of a Promoter will vary depending on the industry you're in. To avoid confusion and get the best candidates for the position, write a job description that accurately describes what you need down to the last detail. At the most basic level, a Promoter is a bit like a marketing director. Their chief assets are their network and their deep knowledge of your target audience. Their job is to create the marketing strategy that will help you reach a wider audience and ultimately get you more customers.

The similarities end there. A radio promoter will make sure that your music gets heard by activating his professional relationships with DJs and Music Promoters. A club promoter will ensure more traffic to your venue by advising you on details such as cover charges, drink pricing and music choices. They'll develop marketing materials, such as flyers, to turn over to a street team (the individuals on this team are also sometimes referred to as promoters, so again, be specific with the responsibilities of the role). You may want to hire them for a one-time project or keep them on for a long time. Be sure to also include the terms of employment in your job description.

Promoters are decisive, creative and communicative. They're also "idea people." Get candidates talking by asking the right mix of open-ended interview questions. Listen closely to the way they talk about their industry. The most promising candidates will talk about their past successes. They'll try to find out your pain points and pitch you some of their own ideas.
