Store Manager Interview Questions

From a high level, promising Store Managers should have done their research on your company. They should know how many stores you have, where you're headquartered and who your customers are. They should be aware of your competitors and able to talk about what your company can do to get ahead. They should also be able to list the range of factors that impact sales in your store. Consider asking specific interview questions for managers.

At the day-to-day level they should be strategic, persuasive, communicative and have good stamina to work long hours on their feet. They should know how to build and train teams. For example, they should be comfortable with walking you through how they'd train someone to set up a cash register, manage inventory, or close the store. They should also be able to discuss strategies for motivating their colleagues to reach sales goals and deliver outstanding customer service.

The Store Manager you hire will either have previous store management experience or will be someone you promote in your own store. If you're considering candidates for an internal promotion, you'll be turning a peer into a boss. Address that when you interview them. Your Store Manager should be able to maintain professional relationships with retail associates. This person should be a leader that their team trusts to make the right call at all times—even in difficult situations, such as reprimanding and firing employees.
